Summer Program

Subin: And we also introduced this world building curriculum to our summer camp program. So last year we also had Horizon and Nest together. That's when we piloted the World Building program. It was really nice because it was a small group, but it was very consistent and also we had luxury of having enough time to do any activities with the kids.

So we planned out having like 90 minutes per day. But you know what? They are so interested in they don't want to stop working on their project. So we could have like, "Okay, we're going to continue working on this!" because some days we had 2 hours, some days it was all day maker club activities. So it was really intense and kids really enjoyed it because it was four days a week, Monday through Thursday, for four weeks, they was able to, like they were able to fully experience and enjoy all the making process.
